LOS ANGELES, CA, UNITED STATES, June 2, 2021 /EINPresswire.com/ -- "Migrations," the latest short story collection from Puerto Rican writer J.L. Torres, takes us inside the lives of the self-exiled. A womanizing "sucio" goes to an underground clinic for therapy to end his machista ways and is accidentally transitioned. Ex-gangbangers try to keep their troubled, gifted son from the gangsta lifestyle promoted by an emerging music called hip-hop. Dead and stuck "between somewhere and nowhere," the great Puerto Rican baseball icon Roberto Clemente must confront the reason for his predicament.

Each story expertly merges the worldly with the bizarre, following a cast of characters estranged from their loved ones, family, culture, and collective history. "Upon reading the first tale, I understood that I held a masterwork in my hands," writes novelist Yxta Maya Murray. "[Torres's] narratives illuminate the loneliness of exile, unbelonging, and the necessary struggles to find love."

Despite the effects of colonization of the body and mind, Puerto Ricans form part of the American mosaic. We have stories to tell."
—J.L. Torres

J.L. Torres has previously published short stories, a novel, and a collection of poetry. His work across genres explores the diasporican experience: living in the inbetweeness that forms and informs what it means to be Puerto Rican. "I am exploring what it means to live a life yearning for 'belongingness' at a time when you're told nation and home are empty concepts," Torres says, "and you have no historical memory of what they ever meant." The stories of 'Migrations' are apt manifestations of the Puerto Rican diaspora, scattered between Puerto Rico, the Bronx, Maui, Cancún, and even a virtual reality. The collection opens with a line by the Puerto Rican poet Victor Hernández Cruz, "Migration is the story of my body," speaking powerfully to Torres's characters as they navigate physical transition as well as the flux of circumstance and identity.

"Migrations" is the winner of the inaugural Tomás Rivera Book Prize, a unique partnership between the Los Angeles Review of Books and the University of California, Riverside, that honors the legacy of writer and UC chancellor Tomás Rivera. The prize aims to discover and foster extraordinary writing by an author whose work examines the contributions of Chicana/Latina in the United States. "Migrations' showcases a major talent," says this year's judge, the writer Luis Alberto Urrea. "It resonates with the music of hard-luck classics from our past, yet sings songs of evasive redemption."

Published on June 1, 2021 from LARB Libros, "Migrations" is a bold and multifaceted collection deeply embedded in the Puerto Rican experience. "Despite the effects of colonization of the body and mind, Puerto Ricans form part of the American mosaic," says Torres. "We have stories to tell."
